The First Lady of the United States is the title given to the President's wife starting with Mary Lincoln (1861-1865). Before that, First Ladies were just called the President's wife.

They help the president with social and diplomatic events, determine White House decorations and design, and do a lot of charitable work and projects to help people. Many "First Ladies" were not President's wives, but friends or family who took on the role. When a woman is elected President, if she has a husband, he would be the first First Gentleman.
